

We the People

The United States Constitution has an article in it that is overlooked by Hillsdale College, and people like Glenn Beck, those in the Christian Right, and the protesters of Occupy Wall Street.

It is often referred to as the supremacy clause. Encyclopedia Britannica calls it the lynch pin of the Constitution that keeps the structure of the type of government guaranteed in the Constitution from falling apart; which is republican, but it has nothing to do with the Republican Party just as democracy had nothing to do with the Democratic Party. It's republican because it calls for an awareness of where knowledge and power meet. With no representation in proportion to population, there is no such place; the US government is homeless. Taxation without representation is just as valid today, as it was in 1776 for most US citizens. With no common knowledge of Article 6, America's first Constitutional government regressed into a replication of a European democracy; but it's not a done deal.

When the 62nd Congress in Session 5 limited the number of Congressional districts to the number of representatives each state was entitled to on Aug 8th of 1911, the nation has a whole stepped off the path We the People are suppose to be following as enshrined in the Preamble. The path for establishing justice was also obfuscated by the transmigration of immigrants who did not read the house rules of their new homeland. A few brought with them the tyranny they were fleeing from; hence, about five percent of the population controls Congress. We the People need to simply get back on the path of forming a more improved union with a constitutional renaissance; hence the inspiration for this Web page and the E-book.
